It is, therefore, to be regretted that the above name was so hastily applied, especially as it has long been known that a special work was about to appear upon the subject. or two leaves of Ferns (Otopteris obtusa) have been met with. The yellow Cypris Limestone (No. 6), which lies about twenty feet above the Bone bed, is a hard nodular stratum, and bears a strong mineralogical resemblance to the Muschelkalk. It has a very uneven and irregular fracture, and is waved and variegated like the Landscape stone of Somersetshire, which it very probably represents. This bed is described at a future page; where I have entered into some details respecting its position, structure, and organic contents in the more immediate neighbourhood of Bristol, where it is largely developed. The fossils from...
