Excerpt: . . . would be to make the lessons arise out of the pupils own mental and physical activities. In courses like these, excellent as they may be, the pupil is forced into a groove which after all is not of his own making. Still these exercises indicate a very great advance upon the system which has been supplanted. The lessons range round objects, the conversations are afterwards supplemented by grammar, and then come a number of other features. The talks are simple, increase in difficulty very gradually, and the author has kept the idea of oral teaching steadily in view. Half a dozen clever illustrations add to the attractiveness of an already interesting book. Edited (Mac-Marchand D'Allumettes. Par by Cloutesley Brereton. millan and Co. 2s.) The story which has won high honours in France is entertaining, and it is only one of the many...
