Not illustrated. 1905 Excerpt: . . . approaches most nearly in flavor to the Royal Chinook. When young, it has a very bright blue color on its sides and back, with a touch of silver on the under part of the body. Later it becomes a deep crimson, with a bright olive-green head. The flesh is, at all times, a brilliant red, but is firmer and drier than that of the Royal Chinook. The fish are also smaller than the kings of the tribe, rarely exceeding an average weight of eight pounds at four years of age. Descending the scale of value we come next to the silver salmon, a rather poor fish, that sells at low prices. When canned it is worth only about half as much as the red salmon. The humpback salmon is yet cheaper, but great quantities are sold among the negroes in the South and in the markets of China and Japan. Finally, there is the dog salmon, which would not be canned at all were it not that the packers sometimes desire to keep their plants in operation when no better grade of fish is available. To see the salmon-fishing industry in its most picturesque form one must visit the city of Astoria, at the mouth of the Columbia River, where the stream is miles wide and where a small army of men, including a number of Indians, are employed either as shoremen or fishers. There is no prettier scene in the Northwest than the thousands of...
