We have previously identified IV and V as a leading practice for large and 11 complex system development and acquisition programs. In addition, a review published in 1999 by the Institute of Electrical and Electronics 12 Engineers ( IEEE ) found that IV and V had a measurable beneficial effect on a programs development. For example, it promoted the earlier detection of system faults, identified a greater number of faults, helped to reduce the average time it takes to fix faults, and enhanced operational correctness. The study concluded that any process that systematically applies well-designed IV and V activities to a structured software development process would result in similar benefits. Typically, IV and V is performed by an agent that is independent of the development organization to obtain unbiased reviews of a systems processes, products, and results, with the goal of verifying and validating that these meet stated requirements, standards, and user needs. As 13 such, we have reported that IV and V is work above and beyond the normal quality assurance and performance review activities performed during system development and acquisition. This work must not substitute for the developers responsibility, but should complement and reinforce the developers system engineering processes, configuration management, and qualification test functions. According to recognized industry 14 standards, IV and V can provide management with an objective assessment of a programs processes, products, and risks throughout its life cycle and help ensure conformance to program performance, schedule, and budget targets. Furthermore, it can help facilitate the early 11 See GAO-09-96 and...
